Ride-Sharing Program

After receiving several suggestions from students about the transportation to school, we have decided to organize a school ride-sharing program, in order to provide students living in the same area or community with a ride to school as a means of shared transportation. Moreover, we believe carpooling will be good for students to save money from the rising cost of gas and bus fares. Please note that this program is also an excellent means to protect the environment by reducing a great deal of pollution released from car emissions.

Now listen to a conversation between two students.

Signaling

In economics, signaling is an approach. That is, companies use third parties to credibly convey some positive information about their products to consumers who may not be sensitive to the difference between good and bad product quality. More precisely, producers or sellers of good-quality products can distinguish themselves from that of bad-quality ones by offering high-price goods or services. However, consumers are not capable of telling the difference and not likely to purchase something expensive either. Therefore, having a third party to make objective judgments such as conducting experiments is essential to guide consumers to make purchasing decisions for high-quality products.
